Living in a country where you have to speak a foreign language can cause serious social problems, as well as practical problems.

To what extent do you agree or disagree with this statement?

Speaking plays a critical role in human lives as to why it is considered comfortable to speak in mother-tongue. In this case, it is believed that to speak in another language except for mother-tongue can cause problematic issues while living abroad. I assume that, this can lead social as well as practical problems.

Initially, it can be extremely difficult to reside in a place without talking properly. Since the world revolved around the communication skills, it is absolutely essential to communicate with individuals to meet the basic needs as well as being provided better job opportunities. The primary reason is that, as long as a person talks fluently without any language barrier, he or she can find suitable job without serious issues. For instance, there are a large number of immigrants living abroad, but, sadly, due to the lack of their language ability, they cannot have a better job, and subsequently they will be disappointed in the society. As a result, the more language skills individuals have, the better job opportunities will be created for them.

Furthermore, in some cases it can be tough for those who want to learn a language starting from the scratch. Despite the fact that a lot of people have the ability to learn the new language, it might be challenging for them to acquire a new skill, particularly if it is a new language. It might be feasible. However, many people do not appreciate interacting with others completely in a foreign language for their whole life. Consequently, there might be some problems such as the lack of fluency, and speaking from the bottom of their heart in order to live professionally and also settling down marital life. As a result, in spite of learning a new language, the consequences should not take for granted.

Living in a place which the citizens speak indigenously can cause numerous problems for non-native ones even though they are really good at it.

Some major social and practical challenges that people living abroad face stem from language barrier. I believe this can result in considerable social problems, but practical ones are not that big and can be solved.

Not knowing the nuances in the target language as a foreigner can cause loneliness. This is mainly due to breakdown in communication, which is of paramount importance in any relationship. A foreigner would not understand the jokes in that language, nor would he/she know the register and contextual use of some idiomatic expressions. Thus, should an immigrant not know such underlying details, they will feel left out in small groups and communities, which eventually leads to alienation at least at the beginning of their stay.

There might also be some practical problems while doing daily routines due to failure in understanding. Shopping for grocery or clothes, for instance, could be challenging if a person is not proficient enough to speak and comprehend the local language, he may end up purchasing an unwanted or useless item. Another example would be when asking for direction which could result in misunderstanding leading to choosing the wrong route and wasting their time, which ultimately makes them furious. However, thanks to technology, such problems can be addressed without much hassle. For example, Google Map, Translate applications, and online shopping have enabled many foreign residents to do their daily routines with ease.

In conclusion, granted, there are some practical problems involved in living in a foreign country where you do not have a good command of its language, but the internet and numerous applications have addressed such issues. However, social activities which require a more in-depth connection cannot be addressed easily unless an immigrant gradually achieves the proficiency in the language.
